SOURCE Finansy i Kredit SSSR, No 1, 1952.EDITORIAL STATEMENT OF NEW SOVIET PERIODICAL ON FINANCE

As of July 1952, the periodicals Sovetskiye Finansy and Den'gi i Kredit were combined into one periodical, Finansy i Kredit SSSR, an organ of the Ministry of Finance USSR.

On the basis of Marxist-Leninist theory, this periodical undertakes to throw some light on the role and significance of finance, money, and credit in the development of Communist society, to point out the great superiority of Soviet finance over the finance of capitalist states, and to expose bourgeois finance and credit theories advanced by imperialist states in the service of monopolist capital.

It will be the task of the periodical to explain questions dealing with the work of financial organs, institutions of the Gosbank, and long-term investment banks concerned with the mobilization of financial resources for the development of Communist society, and the maintenance of strict economy in the expenditure of material and monetary resources. The periodical will also answer questions dealing with the increases in profitability of socialist enterprises and organizations, tightening of control over the ruble in production and circulation, and the strengthening of cost accounting and credit relationships in the national economy.

Articles on foremost methods and standards of the work of banking and financial personnel must have an important place in this periodical, as well as criticism of shortcomings in the work of financial organs, the Gosbank, and long-term investment banks.

The periodical will also acquaint its readers with the finances of the People's Democracies and the role they play in the development of socialist principles in these countries, in their progress toward socialism, with the help and experience of the USSR.

The editors appeal to workers in all fields of the financial and credit system, to financial workers of economic organizations, to scientific workers, and to instructors in finance and economics in higher educational institutions to take an active part in the work of the new periodical.-- The Editors
